ENGLISH WIRE MAN GETS BADLY BALLED

Telegrapher From abroad Makes Dramatic Failure of Attempt to Report Ball Game.

"I ran into something absolutely new, I believe, during the last world's war," says Fielder Jones, once leader of the world's champion White Sox—"something that gave me an experience that is good for a laugh any time I think of it over. I came all the way from Washington—the state, not the city—to see the big series, and was commissioned to report the doing for a Chicago paper. When I arrived in Philadelphia, credentials in hand, I was told that a specially clever telegraph operator had been assigned to work for me, and that I would find him a dandy."

This naturally pleased me, for I knew there would be need for a quick man and a skillful one. When you are covering that sort of ball game, you must work fast, work accurately, and have a key-puncher with you who is up to date in telegraphing. Tricked to death I sat in a real Morse chair, I leaped out to Shibe Park, and sought for my reservation.

"There was no operator, all I found out was that he was to be the boy to handle the key in the preliminary meetings of competitive newsmen that were to start the day, and was not only stalled on the keys, but must be a genuine fan and an expert in all the language of the game—and he was an Englishman, detailed to handle the most important games of all, started on me with a genial smile, 'Good gosh, old chap,' said he, 'but I'm not responsible for the fine points of your blossoming game I know. You can just describe the stuff, though, and I'll get it.'

however, 'understand.'

I looked at him helplessly, and just then the bell rang. Sheppard came up to the bell and called the first one.

"One strike on Sheppard, I dictated."

"Oh, yes, yes," cried the Englishman, "why doesn't the beggar run? Well out, yknow, hardly well out!"

"I moaned in misery. Just take the way I tell it, said I. It will be all one."

"A long foul tell beyond the ropes. Sheppard drove out a long foul to left," said I.

"Aye, aye, aye," cried the Englishman, "why doesn't the beggar run? Well out, yknow, hardly well out!"

"With difficulties I controlled myself and the Englishman. He paid good attention for a bath while, and we got along nicely until Baker broke off the first of his great two-baggers."

Baker hit into the crowd for two bounces. I dictated. And the enthusiastic Englishman, now thoroughly interested, settled finally on the key. A few minutes later, there was a stir in the press where the chief operator was roosting, and he began hurrying toward me. With him was furious message from my Chicago paper asking what the places I meant by the stuff I was sending. I took one look at the copy and then forgetting the play, the importance of the occasion, and the dignity of Shibe Park, I converted upon that Englishman. He fled before I could connect, and a young anti took the key.

The Englishman had sent this message regarding Baker's two-hander. "Overall" looked a fast chop that seemed about to topple Baker's wicked.

Baker cut it out magnificently, the ball going over long leg into the gallery beyond the out bounds. It was well hit, and he should have scored sixteen runs, but did not run it out, stopping when half way around the incoming amphitheater."
